Antarctic glacier melt linked to La Nina winds

Full Text:

Glacial melting in Antarctica has for some time been connected to long-term global climate change, but a recent study published in Science has found that shorter-term weather and climate events such as La Niña have influenced the melting of Pine Island Glacier, which constitutes about 10% of the West Antarctic ice Sheet (WAIS) and is one of the primary conduits for ice shedding from Antarctica. As the WAIS is a potential significant contributor to rising global sea levels, the finding could have important implications for sea level projections.

Pine Island Glacier's ice shelf--the part of the glacier that's over water--has been thinning since at least the 1970s, when such measurements were first taken there. An inflow of circumpolar deep water (CDW) from the Pacific and Indian Oceans collects in a gap underneath the ice shelf, with warmer water sliding over an underwater ridge and melting the ice shelf from below, causing the tip of the glacier to discharge more ice. But in observations taken in 2012, scientists noticed that cold water had accumulated around the underside of the shelf, resulting in a 50% decrease in melting of the shelf compared to measurements taken two years earlier; in fact, the melting was the lowest ever recorded at the location.
